What you save on fuel will pay for a WILSON HEATER in one season. Burns Wood.

Harriet De Witt Denies She Wrote Them and Easton Residents Await Developments With Trepidation.

Easton, Pa., Sept. 2.—Every inch of the way in the hearing before United States Commissioner Turner of Miss Harriet De Witt, of Easton, charged with sending scandalous and scurrilous letters through the mails to several people in Easton, is being hotly contested by counsel for the defense.

When the hearing was begun former Judge W. S. Kirkpatrick, one of the leading lawyers at the Northampton county bar, appeared with Marshall Miller, of Philadelphia, N. J., for Miss De Witt.

Only three witnesses were heard. They were Rev. Elmer E. Snyder, pastor of Christ Lutheran church, who had received many of the anonymous letters; Mrs. David White, a neighbor of Miss De Witt; and Valentine Shoenberger, a post office inspector.

Each time a witness testified, the defendant is accused of having written the letters and identified by the witnesses who received them.

Many of the most prominent residents of Easton are awaiting with trepidation the developments in the "Poisoned Pen" case.

So far the authorities have jealously guarded the worst of the letters, which it is asserted were sent by Miss De Witt, who is the daughter of wealthy George De Witt, and which have threatened to wreck a score of homes.

The great question disturbing many minds in Easton is what will be disclosed. For it is alleged similarity to a letter to a member of the De Witt family, and that of the scurrilous letters, which have been sent to hundreds of people in the last ten years, the chief evidence against Miss De Witt is a letter to the Rev. Elmer E. Snyder, pastor of the Lutheran church, which was supposed to be from a woman named "Mabel," and which was supposed to be from a woman named "Mabel."

Each yard gave clue.

It is contended that the back yard of the parsonage where the clothes are hung can be seen only from a bay window of the De Witt home. A high board fence hides the back yard from the street. It is admitted that it was this letter which first directed suspicion toward Miss De Witt.

Sentiment is strongly divided as to the guilt of Miss De Witt. But, after years of suspicion cast on several other women, there is a determination if possible and end forever the heart-burnings that have upset so many households.

The writer of the anonymous letters boasted in one of her latest that she had written fully 1500 missives to members of the Evangelical Lutheran church, telling what she described as unpleasant truths not only about the pastor, but about his beautiful young bride of a year. The writer went so far as to suggest that Mrs. Snyder had been in the habit of visiting the parsonage late at night, and had been far from conventionally clothed when she swept off the front porch.

Several times half hearted attempts have been made to trace the writer since the letters began ten years ago. Two other women have been identified by arranged before the United States commissioner. One if them died two years ago, her death hastened, her friends assert, by the humiliation of the unjust suspicion.

The chief difficulty in the present case is the absolute lack of motive on Miss De Witt's part. The only explanation of her animosity toward the minister, if any exists, goes back almost to the time when Mr. Snyder, just out of Lafayette college, took charge of the old church ten years ago.

At that time, the neighbors say, Miss De Witt was "as good as engaged" to a young man from Martin's Creek, who was a college and fraternity mate of the young minister. When this came to Easton he stayed at the parsonage. After several such visits he ceased to visit Easton, and whatever attachment there was between him and Miss De Witt was broken off.

It may be that Miss De Witt blamed the estrangement on the minister. If so, she declares he was innocent of any desire to come between the couple, although he admits that he never was attracted to Miss De Witt.

As evidence of her innocence, Miss De Witt will produce several anonymous letters which she says she has herself received. It will be asserted by the prosecution that they were all written by Miss De Witt in the past several years of time as has now arrived.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 2.—Mental suggestion and theories of the nature of which the human brain is inducible are believed to have played an important part in the tragedy which ended when the body of Samuel E. Easton, a young electrician, was found swinging at the end of a trunk strap in the cellar of his home at 230 Mountain street.

The discovery of the body was made by his brother Abraham, who is said to be one of the factors in the strange story, which opened nearly two months ago, when Samuel attempted to end his life by inhaling gas. While the family of the dead man, who was twenty-three years old, are at a loss to account for his strange actions of late, it is thought that his overwrought brain, under the influence of two picture post cards, which he received some time ago and in which death was depicted in various forms, conceived the idea that only in the grave could he find relief from the morbid fancies which had preyed upon his mind.

Post Cards Suggest Death.

It was while he was boarding at a house on Marshall street that Easton, who was of a highly nervous and fanatical temperament, received two post cards. One card pictured the corner of a quaint and moss-grown little cottage, and the other a picture of a tombstone. The De Witts had been living on the corner of the cottage, and the tombstone was a feature of the foreground. On the tombstone Easton's name and name were clearly printed in it under the inscription of "Here lies the body of —." The other card represented the interior of a cathedral, with the altar decorated for the celebration of a high requiem mass, while at the foot of the chancel rested a casket.

Both cards were mailed in Atlantic City and when Easton received them he remarked that they must be from his brother and expressed a decided opinion of what he thought of that style of a joke. At that time Easton was a few days off of electrical work and was rather dependent, as work had been slack.

He was also deeply worried over a love affair which he had carried on for several months with his second cousin, who was in the habit of visiting him at the cottage. Easton was deeply infatuated with the girl and was in constant attendance upon her, never being contented unless he was in her company.

Quarrelled With Sweetheart.

The girl, however, tired of his constant devotion, frequently quarrelled with him. On the day following the receipt of the post cards they had a serious and final quarrel. For three days afterward Easton would gaze constantly at the two post cards, which seemed to have made an abnormal impression on his mind, and would exhibit them to his friends and ask them if there was not some hidden meaning in the fact that his name was on the tombstone.

After the post cards had been in Easton's possession for about a week he went to his home, and on the morning and, carefully placing the two cards in a conspicuous position at the foot of the bed, looked the door and stopped all the crevices in the room with waste paper. He then attached a rubber hose to the gas jet, placed the tube in his mouth, tied his feet with a piece of rope and turned on the gas.
